‘Day Before Wedding’ Client Film Pitch

Status

My concept is set the day before the wedding, and I'd love for the film to explore the intimate, ordinary moments that precede the day of ceremony, the undercurrent of excitement and nervousness and all those emotions below by all accounts a lovely and ordinary day.

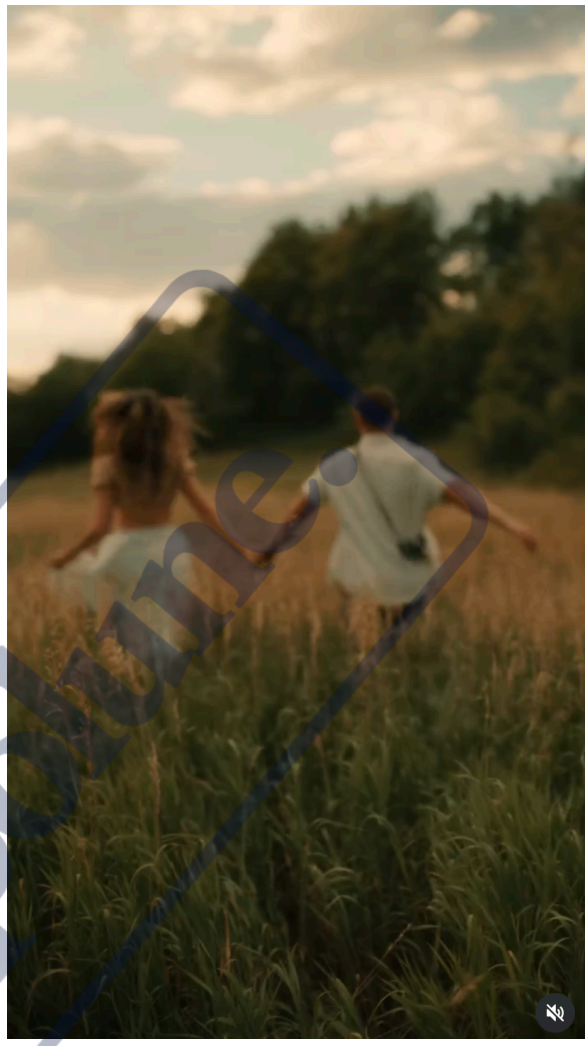

First shot is a wide framed through a dark doorway looking out to the water, and you standing outside with a coffee, taking in the air. In the background we hear the sounds of your partner, coming through the door to stand with you, and some silent exchanges between the two of you, before we transition seamlessly from the quiet of the house straight into the snap of a car door, heading out with no grand announcement that tomorrow is the wedding—just a normal day that belongs entirely to the two of you.

You go to a drive-in to grab burgers, then go to find a quiet meadow for an unhurried picnic in the grass. This is where the visual texture opens up: top-down grass shots, spontaneous dancing, and those playful moments that slowly settle into genuine tenderness. As the afternoon bleeds into golden hour, we lean into slow-shutter motion and a dreamy, painted light—just sitting together in the open trunk of the car with the hatch up, taking it all in before the noise of the weekend.

From there, we take to the open road. A long, unhurried drive with nowhere in particular to be. We keep the scene audio quiet, letting an intimate voiceover carry the weight of the moment while the camera lingers on the small, tactile details: the wind in her hair, hands touching over the gear shifter, the landscape blurring past.

When blue hour settles in, the mood shifts into something deeply vulnerable. The car's headlights carve out a warm halo in the cool dusk, framing a quiet dance in the fading light.

Finally, you pull back up to the house and walk down toward the water one last time, framed by that same doorway against the night. After a long moment, you turn around, walking past the lens like quiet silhouettes. You step inside, flip the house lights on, and the warm glow finally reveals what's been waiting in the doorway all along: your wedding dress and tux, hanging side by side.

I have my own cinema camera kit and lenses which we use ordinarily for our short films & commercial work, and could handle basically all equipment needs from my end. I also own, and have experience working with Super8 film, if that's something you're interested in — could be an interesting texture to loop into this video for specific shots!

Now, without knowing you guys personally, I can't say for certain if the following is something apt for your relationship. But a continuity I have found in my own relationship with my partner, and that has been the subject of so much of my creative work, has been the idea of promises made and promises kept, and the precise way that we've grown together over the years, in all its imperfection and the sincerity, becoming the thing we love each other for. If you're on board, I'd love to layer these shots over voiceovers I'd record with each of you guys separately, getting some soundbites about promises made to each other over the years, from the sillier, everyday commitments to the deeper vows you've grown into over time.

The structure of the piece would rely on this interlocking voiceover recorded separately with each of you, steering the narrative as we move through these scenes. Rather than a standard recap or speech, we weave your voices together in dialogue with each other, meditating on this idea of promises made and promises kept.
